The 23-year-old forensic psychology graduate, encouraged by her friends, decided it was time to break with the centuries-old tradition of sexual inequality in card decks that rank men above women.

“If we have this hierarchy that the king is worth more than the queen, and that inequality influences people in their daily life because it’s just another way of saying ‘hey, you’re less important,’” she said in an interview. “Even subtle things can do play a big role.”

After a lot of trial and error, she designed a genderless deck in which the king, queen and jack were replaced with gold, silver and bronze.

Friends and family snapped up the first 50 decks of GSB (Gold, Silver and Bronze), which have images of gold bars, silver coins and a bronze shield. Mellink made and began selling them online.

Within a few months, she had sent out around 1,500 packs, including to Germany, France and the United States. Game shops have also shown interest, she said.

Mellink has been testing the cards out on players, who said they had never been conscious of sexual inequality in decks before. Switching would take time, she said.

“It is good that we reflect on gender neutrality,” said Berit van Dobbenburgh, head of the Dutch Bridge Association, while playing with the new cards. It was a bit complicated to make a formal switch because that would require updating the rules, she said.

“I wonder if it’s worth it. But gender neutrality, I am all for it! It’s g of this age has noticed this. It’s the new generation.”
